Back on the Northside — by keexote, Winter 2018

A Poem by Kee Warner (University of Colorado, U.S.A.)
kwarn@uccs.edu

I
stopped by Rosalinda’s a few years back and her oldest son reminded me how we once packed the liquor board hearings demanding they shut down the scourge of bullet-ridden nightclubs Now that Highland has become Highlands there are more liquor licenses than ever, he said, I came home the other night and found a drunk guy passed out on my front porch and the dude was, like, fluently White!
The future landed on the Northside like a Kansas farmhouse on Lollipop Land Scottish village is a sedimentary layer beneath stands of apartment towers The sandstone facade of the Tallmadge Building is brushed clean and new windows sparkle a tea house and yoga center loiter the sidewalk along Zuni

Before Peña imagined a great city we planted seeds for new life lending out tools and weatherizing redrawing zoning lines installing new curbs Remember the street party when low riders and b boys paraded West 32nd...
We cheered as dozers knocked over the broken-down gas station on the corner gone were the junkers, chainlinks and dobermans but we did not want to push out the old families clustered around Our Lady of Guadalupe and Mt. Carmel the Capilluppos and Ortegas We knew we didn’t hold the levers of control but thought that someone did Then Denver took off like a sea monster rising out of the deep shimmering scales, fire and smoke massive tail roping through the wave tops laying blocks flat reconfiguring at the pace of Pixar

Now I sip IPA in a brewpub of first order on 29th Instead of falling up in a vertigo spin I look across thirty-five years, thousands of miles and it seems as natural as the riffing rock guitar strangely become background music

As normal as the young dads with cropped beards and striped cotton shirts with their toddlers in tow savoring an evening craft beer in their neighborhood of choice

The Northside unfolds another chapter as real and imaginary as each one before.
Traversing the creative destruction of a city on the make only a super-sized ego can claim much credit.
my small role, only a trace a singular point of view like the abandoned flour mill that towered north of the railyards where winds blew through unhindered a solitary, windowless sentinel harboring graffiti Inferno What endures in my mind and body of memories are flavors of tamale and calzone voices, scars, faces, and stories

Stretching across and connecting as the old twentieth street viaduct once spanned Platte Valley from St. Pats to Chapultepec
viaduct once spanned Platte Valley gliding above the glint of steel tracks curving toward Union Station.